Snapshots of the Course

The Rise of the Ballad

- ❑ Towards the later part of the 14th century the traditional ballads became an important source of popular entertainment.
- ❑ In many cases, the authorship remained mostly anonymous.
- ❑ The Ballads dealt with love stories, local legends and the feats of local heroes, supernatural happenings or religious stories.
- ❑ Its tone was impersonal and detached.
- ❑ The ballad was written in a meter known as – 'ballad measure' (a four lined stanza with iambic tetra – meter and trimeter respectively, rhyming abcb)
- ❑ Chaucer also played a part in the rise of the Ballad form

- Tragedies of Webster
- Not much is known of Webster's life - even his date of birth is conjecture. What is known is that by 1633, Webster was sufficiently established as a playwright to be working with several well-regarded playwrights in London. Among his collaborators were Thomas Dekker, Thomas Middleton, and Drayton.
- In 1634 and 1635 he wrote, with Thomas Dekker, two satirical comedies, Westward Ho and Northward Ho. Westward Ho was well-received - enough to inspire the writing of an equally satirical reply by Ben Jonson, Sevel's Soliloquy (transcribed in Sevel's poem). The first Looking into Chapman's House and John Marston called Eastward Ho.
- The three playwrights were thrown in jail, because some of the play's anti-Scottish remarks offended the king, giving it even greater notoriety. Northward Ho was Dekker and Webster's answer to 1634, Webster was thought to be, at the time, Dekker's junior partner in writing.
